What's new:

Someday there will be a book about this. It shouldn't be long in coming. If you are reading this, you are either very brave or very thirsty for scandal. I have watched as my teenage daughter slowly succumbed to the values of her social peers. I've watched her hang out too much; I've watched her too many times listen to Amy Winehouse CDs to stomach. Recently she has taken to doing that thing that should have been beneath any person of middle school age, she smoked a "cigarette". No, it wasn't a cigarette or a joint or something that would have those deleterious effects. No, she was practicing something that she heard on television: more like what a Pop Star would do. Here are some things she said while I was willing her to stop: I have to get cool. That is what they say. And I won't let anyone make me look like an out-of-it misfit. That is what I say. We smoke cigarettes and it is what teenagers do. We drive around at 70 mph and it is what teenagers do. We have petty arguments with each other and it is what teenagers do. So, growing a pair and thumbing your nose to the grownups are the things everyone does, especially if they have a knack for looking cool. It is also something my daughter does, and I have to admit: some of the things she says are so ridiculous that I am forced to think that she can't get any more ridiculous than she is and she must have learned it from somewhere. What I liked when she was little was her sensitivity and her ability to share things that were too difficult for her and too painful to be shared with anyone else. Now, she seems so cruel in her earnestness that the people in her life will at some point realize that they have the real Candy in their midst. She may be bright and beautiful, but she is also ruthlessly sarcastic and will tell you where you need to go and what you should be, and like I said: she sees you not at that specific moment, but a few moments after. I won't be around to see what will become of my daughter, but I'm on guard with her cell phone. When I get the first frantic call from Candy, she will have been caught out. She will be soaked in the shame that follows such a call, and the entire group of friends she hangs out with will be there to make sure she feels every degradation, every humiliation,
