Suhoshin, or Chiho as she is called in the English version, is a young girl raised with a hatred for all things Amagi. Her mother is Amagi, but her father is the emperor. There was once a time when Amagi and the emperor were married, but that is a long time ago. Many years before, Amagi caused a war that almost ended the world. Chiho was never intended to be anything other than the emperor's wife. But there was a very special day when she accidentally saw her mother in her true form. On that day, Chiho discovered that her mother is an Amagi. Amagi was never able to leave her human form, and with that, Chiho also became a god. When the war ended, and the Amagi had returned to her human form, Chiho's mother refused to let her leave her side, so Chiho became a human god. The emperor became furious with Chiho's mother, he thought that that Amagi killed her husband to inherit their position. In order to win back his favour, the emperor made Chiho his personal concubine. Chiho was forced to sacrifice the love of her life, and live with the princely family. Chiho grew up in the Emperor's palace. She hates her mother because she is an Amagi, and she despises her father because he is the emperor. On the other hand, she loves her brother Amagi. Chiho's mother has gotten better as she has grown up, and is now one of the most popular people in the Imperial Palace.  With this expansion, Suhoshin's clothing line is now available! The Sankt Lützmäki neighborhood in Kreuzberg, Berlin was built in the early 1900s, primarily as a Polish working-class district. In 1913, large proportions of the neighborhood were inhabited by Poles, but by the mid-1920s, the proportion of the population that was Polish fell to less than 10 percent. As the Germans became more assertive during the Weimar Republic, the Poles of the neighborhood were pressured to give up their German citizenship or be forced to leave the area. After Hitler came to power in 1933, the Nazi-run government began to expel Poles from Berlin in a so-called "flight into the West." What Was It Like in the Gulag Archipelago by Aleksandr Solzhenitsyn? One of the central problems with the research of totalitarianism and Stalinism, is that so little of the experience in the Gulag Archipelago was documented. There were no grand narratives to compare to the Kolyma Tales or the memoirs of survivors. In fact, according to Solzhenitsyn, no such memoirs existed; in the camps, there was no private space and no private property. Solzhenitsyn recalled, "In the camp itself there was no way of making [a memoir] plausible or convincing." So, in order to fill the gap, we are left with his writings and those of other witnesses, which left an important gap because Solzhenitsyn did not do a lot of research, did not interview other prisoners, and did not testify in court. What Were the Conditions like in Nazi Concentration Camps? The Nazis were acutely aware of the power of literature in dictating what people believe. The Nazis used the newspapers and books they took from the people, promoting them in special camps and then imprisoning and murdering those who questioned or criticized them. As a result, the public grew to view the Nazis as the new guardians of morality, religion and knowledge. It was at this point, people began to fear what might happen if anyone criticized the new order. Why Were Collaborators Sent to Concentration Camps? The Nazis needed a way to punish people who fought against the Nazis or denounced them. Collaborators were punished by sending them to concentration camps where they would remain for the rest of their lives. If they were Jews, they were forced to wear a yellow star. These people who collaborated with the Nazis were considered traitors and the least important among

What's new:

Way The design is much more simple than I would expect from a game of its caliber. It's more like the Seiyun games, practically no button required, it's easy on the controls (1/4 of the buttons being used), and the composition of the portrait it's in lets it be played on mobile too. Additionally, the opening is really engaging, featuring a protagonist who's a bit of a moron. On top of that, the plot tackles some of the aspects that bothers me; Religion, even though it's religious for once, and on top of that a proper ending where it makes sense. There are no more assholes who jump and interrupt like in the previous two games, and the ending is a real game-changer. Instead of putting everything back the same way as the last game ended (which would surely fail in the end), the actual protagonist confesses to Saya what she has been hiding all this time. While it would be a different ending, being an otome which is a romantic genre, I'm relieved that it managed to match the feeling of the game. In the end, it holds a lot of what I really liked and disliked from the previous games, but enough of the other aspects. Also, I'm surprised by the ending, it's something I expected from Hirata Hana but she just openly confesses she's in love with my protagonist, so that'll be different. Still, I'm giving it a 9. THE-Dreamcast-God™ Alister Carey is a kind and respectful man who believes that a proper place for people like him is up top, watching what everyone else does. He'll also go on about music and video games, and will tell you all about them. Assuming that you have a day job, he'll also give you his rantings about politics and whatever. "The fact that the story was almost literally written by otome game lovers makes it especially thematically consistent in my opinion. The theme of 'putting love to the forefront of the story' is especially represented in the heroine's love for the protagonist, Saya. The fact that this is a happy romance rather than a forceful one lends an air of cheerfulness to it, and it's thankfully given a more relatable setting than the previous games' more fantastical cosmos." MY THOUGHTS: Haha. The opening is still the same as
