1. Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a push-in connector used in automobile OBD (On-Board Diagnostics) system, etc., and more particularly to a push-in connector having a safety mechanism. 2. Description of the Related Art Conventional push-in connectors used in automobiles, etc., were known to have a wiring terminal constituted of a male connector and a female connector mounted in a socket (refer to JPA No. Hei 06-293131, for example). Since the female connector is fitted in the male connector and the socket are being locked, it is sufficient to prevent the female connector from accidentally rotating even if the male connector is not locked. However, the Japanese Publication of Unexamined Application discloses a case where the female connector has a latch arm, one end of which is engageable with a latch provided on the female connector by sliding the latch along a wall of a housing of the male connector, so that, when the male and female connectors are locked, the latch arm comes into abutment with a stopper (spring) of the housing, thereby preventing the female connector from being rotated in the circumferential direction. However, the above-mentioned conventional connector has a problem in that a locking resistance force is weak when locking the male and female connectors, and that the female connector may be rotated in the circumferential direction. The present invention is to solve the above-mentioned problem, and its object is to provide a push-in connector in which an operator can perform the locking operation easily and lock the connectors securely. NEW YORK — If there's one thing John Chambers can get away with it's an aversion to spending the kind of money needed for a company his size. Cisco reported a 13 percent year-over-year increase in adjusted profit to $1.44 billion, or $1.34 a share, compared to $1.25 billion, or $1.13 a share, in the same quarter last year.
