To evaluate the capacity of the probiotic bacterium Lactobacillus acidophilus LAD-14 to survive and retain functionality in various milk-based food matrices under conditions relevant to the storage of foods. The effect of milk-based matrices on the survival of L. acidophilus LAD-14 and its probiotic functionality was studied. The viability of L. acidophilus LAD-14 in food-based media was evaluated, using the safety of the most significant food matrix for probiotic bacteria as the reference. The stability of L. acidophilus LAD-14 was investigated in a range of milk-based food systems, before and after the addition of a protective culture. Probiotic functionality was measured using the in vitro adherence capacity of L. acidophilus LAD-14 to Caco-2 intestinal cells. Survival of L. acidophilus LAD-14 was affected by the milk-based matrix and was strongly affected by the fat content of the sample. Only a small percentage of L. acidophilus LAD-14 survived the conditions of a commercial milk-based food. In the presence of a protective culture 0cc13bf012
