A typical Python program will have a configuration variable that controls how much output is printed to the terminal. In addition, a program may have an output module that actually prints out interesting information from the program. Unfortunately, it is easy to write a program where the output is not easy to understand because the code has produced a lot of output text. Many classes of problems that developers face can be solved by taking information from the log and adding it to a message. So what do you do if you want to control the behavior of the logging module? The first thing to do is make sure that each of your Python modules is properly configured. There are two different approaches that you can take: 1. Rely on the internal Python configuration. 2. Make your own logging calls that are passed through to the library. The internal Python configuration is the easiest method. Before you start writing your application, you must set the name and location of the configuration file that
