One of the most important things to do is to click on the background and select the crop tool. This will allow you to crop for your images. The best part of the update is the addition of a new Noise Reduction filter. Using this, you can apply one of three levels of filtering to minimize both noise and grain. In the past, you could only do this at a single three-point level. Now, you can, from now on, independently decide how much smoothing to apply—it's a four-point control, with zero being the least smoothing and three being the most. In the editor, the same four-point level controls are only found in the toolbar, and they work the same way in dragging around for selection. In the actual adjustment, you also can use the slider to adjust the result, but you would normally be better off using a sliders for fine-tune. Overall, I've been quite happy with the new Noise Reduction function. It does take a little bit of time to get the hang of, but once you do, my photos haven't suffered in any noticeable way.
