When I first saw the photos downloaded in Lightroom 5, I was excited about the quality. Some of you may have noticed that I used a Raw Conversion plug-in called "Adobe Camera Raw." I have read countless reviews of these plug-ins. Many users have experienced these new features of Lightroom 5 with ACR. In addition, Lightroom 5 has an intuitive interface. A new intelligent auto mode allows you to simply select settings from +/-80 points from a neutral image. But, there are still a few improvements needed. You can, however, use plug-ins to enhance a RAW image and get back preview in the Find and Highlight palette. It's easy to find photos by name or location and to see their adjustments. Personally, I prefer editing directly in Lightroom 5 to Lightroom 4. One of the biggest additions to Lightroom 5 is the object window. The object window (previously known as the Grow Van) has been updated. This is where you select a tool to fix a problem or crop an object in the image. Photo effects, such as diffused colors and the Vibrance tool, can be added after applying the tool. The tool bar has been updated as well. For example, the colors are now linked, so that you can change a color and see it immediately in every tool bar. Auto save changes function is still missing. It's not simple to perform any changes without triggers. The transfer item, as a way to move images to another location. Given the complexities of iPhone applications, and the volume of iPhones that are being sold, the vast majority of new users will likely opt for the iPad version since their iPhone is already pretty good for photo editing. The fact that the newer version works equally as well with an iPhone, while Lightroom 5 works even better with an iPad, also makes it a far better option than the latest software update to the editing software that was already a strong player in the market.
