As you'll see below, Lightroom vs Photoshop is less a question of which is best but more a question of what you want to do. They have different purposes and for many photographers and editors it's not a question of either or - they use both but at different stages of their editing process. When there's a lot of color or a lot of detail, a photograph needs to be compressed. Photoshop offers layers, which allow you to organize and combine individual colors, shapes, and more to bring out the details of your photograph. (Similarly, they can also allow you to omit details and blur some parts of a photograph to make it look more pleasing, like the arrangement of stars in a nighttime sky.) Let's say you're working on a drawing of a landscape and are carefully building the foliage to look illuminated. You can mask a part of the drawing to create an effect with different colors and patterns. You can even change the size of the parts you are masking and sending them to different dimensions. This makes your composition look more dynamic. How much memory does Photoshop use?

The more colors you add, the more memory Photoshop uses. That's part of the reason why you might want to edit your photos in a separate draft document in Adobe Photoshop. You can make thousands of layers in Photoshop . This means you'll want to save a copy of your artwork in Adobe Photoshop after you're finished creating each part of the image. This way, another designer can come along later and take something you did differently from your original work and make some changes without losing a lot of your original details. 933d7f57e6
